Although a judge's administrative power may generally be delegated, a designee of an administrative judge may not designate yet another judge to perform administrative duties assigned to him or her under a rule requiring that administrative duties be performed by the "administrative judge or that judge's designee."

Unlike judicial powers and duties,¹ a judge's administrative power may ordinarily be delegated.² However, a designee of an administrative judge may not designate yet another judge to perform administrative duties assigned to him or her under a rule requiring that administrative duties be performed by the "administrative judge or that judge's designee."³
